The camera travels toward the front door of a house. It opens, and the camera enters the house at eye-level. A coarse male voice greets us snappily:

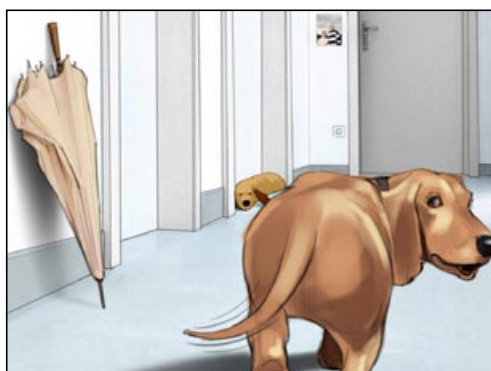

„Hello!“

The camera makes a right and left turn in search of the speaker, then pans down – on the ground in front of us a dachshund is standing. He looks up seriously into the camera and says:

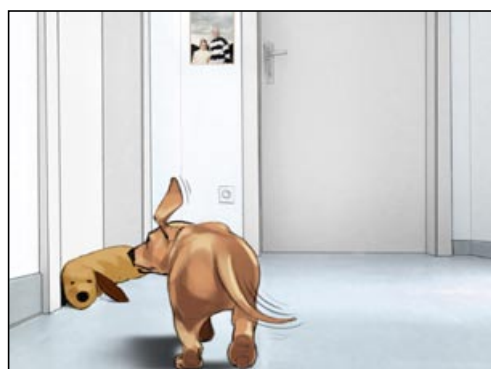

„Come on in.“

Then he turns around and walks into the living room. We follow him.

„Many people use so called „draft dachshunds“.“

He passes a closed door with a „draft dachshund“ (a sausage-shaped cushion against draft, often used in Germany) lying in front of it:

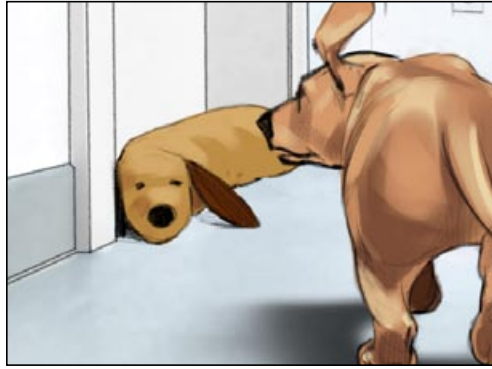

„That’s discriminatory, but still justified.“

He passes close by the draft dachshund and casually says:

„After all, a lot of precious energy is lost due to bad insulation.“

He moves through the room briskly.

„Hello, buddy“

He turns to speak into the camera.

„A good insulation, on the other hand, saves up to 90% heat energy.“
